JENNA HERNANDEZ

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA
CIVIL ENGINEERING

Jenna Hernandez had a key job in UAF's student steel bridge competition this winter: backup parts runner.

Hernandez, a first-year civil engineering student, passed steel pieces to team members on opposite sides of an imaginary river. She had to run, literally. "Oh yeah, because you want to be as fast as you can without stepping in the no-stepping zone," she said.

Hernandez, a first-generation college student, found UAF a natural next step because it was close to home and financial aid was plentiful.

"So I was like, wow, having pretty much free college sounds fantastic — especially as an engineering major with all the labs and extra credits," she said.
